Historic Churches of Holly Springs

Christ Episcopal Church 100 North Randolph Street

Built in 1858, the church features a lofty octagonal spire and 16 stained glass windows as memorials to dedicated church members. The Pilcher tracker organ is the oldest in use in the area today. The organ case is oak and has 40 stenciled façade pipes. Because it has had few changes, the Christ Church instrument is considered one of the best examples of the late 19th century organ builder's art in the mid-South. Be sure to check at Pilgrimage headquarters for details of an organ recital to be held here during the weekend.

First United Methodist Church

175 East Van Dorn Avenue

Built in 1849 and known for its twin circular staircases, the church was used for court sessions after the courthouse was burned during the Civil War. The church treasures a Bible returned by a Union soldier who took it while in Holly Springs. The Pilcher organ was installed in 1926. The organ case has 23 façade pipes and a set of chimes, the only pipe organ in Holly Springs to be so equipped.

First Presbyterian Church

164 South Memphis Street

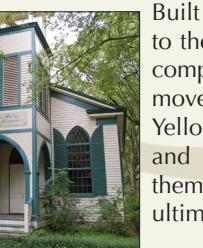

Built in 1860, all construction was stopped on the church during the War Between the States, as Federal troops occupied the church and turned the basement into a stable for their horses. Only the shell of this Romanesque Revival building remained when the war was over, but generous gifts from the Presbyterian churches of the North enabled the congregation to complete the building. Be sure to check at Pilgrimage headquarters for details of a musical concert to be held here during the weekend.

Church of the Yellow Fever Martyrs Museum

305 East College Avenue

Built in 1841 by the Episcopalians but sold to the Catholics in 1858, the structure was completely disassembled by hand and moved to its current location. During the Yellow Fever Epidemic, the Catholic sisters and their priest, Father Oberti, devoted themselves to caring for the victims and ultimately died of the fever themselves.
